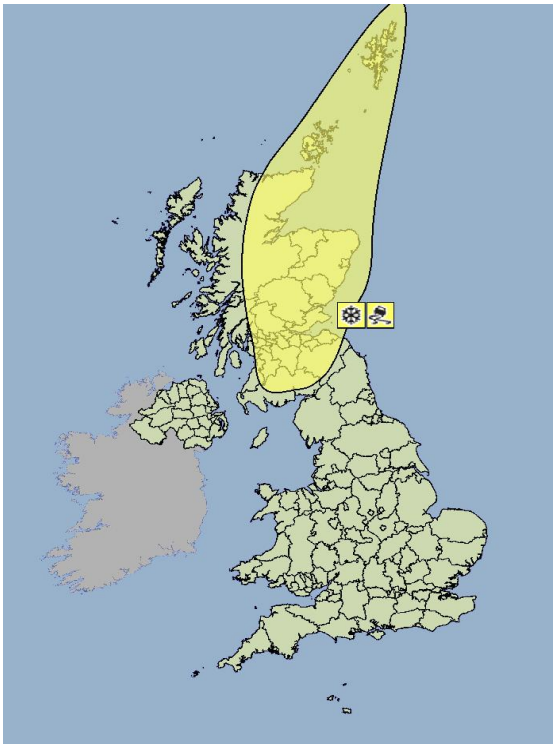
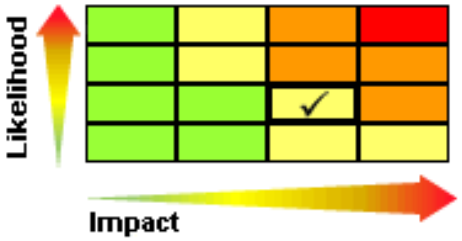
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Further spells of snow affecting Scotland will mainly fall inland whilst in coastal areas there will be a mix of rain and sleet. During Monday snow, and additional accumulations, should become increasingly restricted to hills and mountains over the northern half of Scotland.

In the meantime, some difficult conditions are likely at times at low-levels inland, including through the Central Belt. In terms of accumulations, a further 1-3 cm is expected at some low-levels. Meanwhile, over eastern parts of the Highlands, Grampian Mountains and Southern Uplands a further 5-10 cm will build up in some areas with more significant accumulations developing over the highest parts here.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 10:25 on Sun, 04th Mar 2018 until 23:55 on Mon, 05th Mar 2018

Spells of snow will continue to affect parts of Scotland, bringing further accumulations in places as well as icy stretches on untreated surfaces. Snow will mainly fall inland and will become increasingly confined to hills and mountains during Monday. Further delays to travel and public transport could occur. Further impacts to power supplies/mobile phone coverage are also possible.
